European Union Reverses Course on its Combustion Engine Ban

EU proposes watering down rules aimed at spurring adoption of EVs amid pressure from automakers.

BRUSSELS—The European Union proposed watering down rules that would have effectively banned the sale of new combustion-engine cars in the bloc from 2035, after heavy pressure from the automotive industry. The move announced Tuesday is the latest sign of a major economy pulling back on its electric-vehicle ambitions as the transition away from gasoline-powered cars proves more difficult than many policymakers had anticipated. It comes as the EU seeks to improve its competitiveness and trim some of the rules that businesses say are holding them back. Instead of requiring automakers to completely eliminate carbon-dioxide tailpipe emissions for new cars starting in 2035, the EU's new proposal calls for a 90% reduction from baseline levels. The remaining 10% would need to be made up through the use of low-carbon steel or from e-fuels and biofuels, according to the proposal. The European Commission, the EU's executive arm, said its plan maintains a strong market signal in favor of zero-emission vehicles while giving carmakers more flexibility. The change would mean plug-in hybrid electric vehicles, range extenders and internal combustion engines can still be sold in the EU after 2035, in addition to fully electric and hydrogen vehicles, it said.

Settle in, relax and get ready for dinner on the terrace with a beautiful sunset.
